Theresa May has announced that parliament will be suspended for five weeks from this Friday, and Conservative MPs will be barred from holding any public events until the start of the new session in October. The premier said in a statement: "I believe this is an appropriate course of action to allow the government time to hold discussions with parliament and to ensure that the House of Commons is able to operate as usual for the duration of the recess." No 10 said that the decision to suspend parliament was not connected to the government's dealings with the DUP on a deal that is supposed to bring an end to the deadlock on Brexit, which has brought the country to the brink of a no-deal exit from the EU. However, Downing Street indicated that the decision could have a knock-on effect on the DUP, who have resisted supporting the Conservatives in a confidence and supply agreement with the government. The prime minister said: "This measure of suspension has been taken to ensure that parliament is able to debate and pass legislation without the need for a new general election, should that be required. "Parliament has already voted to allow for a general election, and while there are now no longer any meaningful votes in the Commons, it is appropriate that there is a clear distinction between the business of the government and the business of parliament." "This is a call to all MPs to reflect on how we can serve the public as a whole," the prime minister added. Her announcement came as the Westminster violence protests against Brexit intensified. The prime minister said: "Everyone has the right to protest and express their views. We must, however, all be mindful of how we can allow all sides to peacefully express their views and avoid any actions that may provoke or escalate tensions." The British prime minister was due to return from her visit to Egypt on Monday, but her time in the country has been overshadowed by the continuing disorder across the country. She has had a series of meetings 2d92ce491b
