The use of arch bars in the treatment of atrophic posterior maxilla: a comprehensive study of 10 cases. This article presents the long-term results obtained after 10 years of follow-up for 10 patients treated by combined use of an implant-supported prosthesis and arch bars for the treatment of severe atrophic posterior maxilla. The treatment protocol consisted of the placement of 10 implants and the use of a screw-retained implant-supported prosthesis, after reflection of the maxillary sinuses and after subtotal maxillary resection. At the end of the first and second year after placement of the implants, it was found that the 1-year bone implant stability data were significantly worse than those at the end of the second year. During the second and third year of follow-up, there was an increase in stability. The use of arch bars immediately following implant placement showed that implants located in the bone area enclosed by the arch bars showed better stability compared with implants located in the osseous area between the arch bars. At the end of the second year of follow-up, the stability of implants was higher in the osseous area enclosed by the arch bars compared with implants located in the osseous area between the arch bars. The use of arch bars for the rehabilitation of atrophic posterior maxilla allowed for the immediate placement of implants after reflection of the maxillary sinuses, thereby providing sufficient stability to allow for their osseointegration and bone maturation.
