Vacuole membrane-associated SNARE proteins mediate vesicle fusion at the vacuole in mammalian cells, but the role of SNAREs in plant cells remains unknown. Arabidopsis SNAREs vesicle-associated membrane proteins (VAMP)711 and VAMP713 are located on the vacuolar membrane and mediate a fusion event involved in excretion of proteins of the ABA-regulated secretory pathway in seed coat development. However, no fusion event has yet been observed at the vacuolar membrane. Here, we demonstrate that abscisic acid (ABA) triggers the formation of membrane contact sites (MCSs) between the vacuole and plasma membranes and facilitates the fusion of the two membranes. The VAMP711/713-mediated MCSs appeared in association with the ER-plasma membrane (PM) and the tonoplast-PM contact sites. To determine whether the ABA-induced MCSs involve SNAREs, we examined the effect of the SNARE inhibitor N-ethylmaleimide (NEM). NEM abolished the ABA-induced fusion and the PM localization of VAMP711/713, indicating that NEM disrupts SNARE function. These results demonstrate that SNAREs mediate vacuole-PM fusion and that ABA signaling is essential for MCS formation.Principles of an operational medical support system (OMSS) from the vantage of the OMSS developer. The operational medical support system (OMSS) represents the interface between a hospital's staff and its equipment. Currently, an OMSS can be accessed by any hospital from any location via a network, but the cost of an OMSS platform and the ease of installing it in any hospital remain a concern. Another concern is that the state of the art for hospital information systems (HIS) is that they are not designed to interface directly with the medical care team. Thus, the hospital HIS is not integrated with the medical care team as well as it could be. In this paper, the author discusses the design of an OMSS and the logical constructs and the interaction with the hospital's MIS to make this integrated. Also discussed are some of the pitfalls of development that may not be apparent to the developer at the time of development and why the design process is important to ensure success.Q: Start an application without showing the windows first I'm not sure if this is
