SloGo [Latest]

SloGo is an application designed to help you join the latest party trends and record your guests having the time of their lives without breaking the bank. Download for free Read more The holiday season is right around the corner and since it is the most anticipated time of the year, people spend tons of time doing Christmas shopping, decorating their houses, and going on family vacations. While no one can deny the fun that comes with the festive season, there is one thing that we have to be careful of – the stress. The truth is, when everyone is rushing to get all their shopping done and everything is done just the way they want it to be, nobody can focus on the important things that matter. However, even if this is how you do things most of the year, there are ways to minimize the stress of the holiday season. Whether you're looking for a fun way to unwind from the pressures of the season or just a simple and practical way to ensure that you're not giving your new year the slip, the following ideas should get you thinking: Paint yourself a picture Whether you are looking for a fun, easy, or practical way to handle holiday stress, the best thing you can do is to take some time to create a mental image of the Christmas you want to have. How do you want your house and your family to look? What do you want to see when you open your presents in December? What do you envision on Christmas Eve when your kids and your spouse come home after a long day of work? Write all these things down and then, make a point to visualize them everyday so that they become part of your reality. Skip procrastination While it is understandable to want to move on with things as soon as possible, when you're having a bad day or you find yourself in some sort of stress, it's better to put off your Christmas shopping for a few days. Unfortunately, procrastination often leads to even more stress and anxiety because we become so busy trying to buy everything immediately that the entire experience never feels quite right. If you absolutely have to do your Christmas shopping immediately or if you just want to make sure that you don't lose the holiday magic, just keep your eyes open, be ready to grab some presents, and then take a couple of hours to just sit back and unwind. Dress for the occasion It is the holiday season after all, and people go to
