Q: Java Minecraft: Tile Type in C# I am working on a Java implementation of Minecraft. I have discovered that the GetBlockType returns a byte value when calling GetBlock. What is the byte value supposed to mean? This would be some sort of representation of the tile type in minecraft? Example: Blocks.end:115 I am trying to use the GetBlockType to make sure my world is storing the block types correctly. public class SysUtils { public static void main(String[] args) throws IOException { File file = new File("test.minecraft"); file.getParentFile().mkdirs(); FileInputStream fileInputStream = new FileInputStream(file); FileOutputStream fileOutputStream = new FileOutputStream(file); GZIPOutputStream gzipOutputStream = new GZIPOutputStream(fileOutputStream); // Read all the data from the player's file. byte[] data; data = new byte[(int) file.length()]; fileInputStream.read(data); // Define the blocks. int[] tiles = new int[6]; tiles[0] = 0; tiles[1] = 1; tiles[2] = 2; tiles[3] = 3; tiles[4] = 4; tiles[5] = 5; // Build the world. MinecraftWorld world = new MinecraftWorld(tiles); world.readPlayerData(fileInputStream, data); // Write the world. world.writePlayerData(gzipOutputStream

BRUSSELS (Reuters) - The European Commission will propose next week to exempt "work-from-home" workers from the EU's working time directive, in what would be the single biggest overhaul of EU rules on working hours in more than a decade, sources said on Friday. The European Commission headquarters in Brussels, Belgium December 11, 2017. REUTERS/Yves Herman The rule change, which is being pushed through by the Commission, would establish a new category of "work from home" work, exempting from the working time directive not only the self-employed who keep working from home but also companies that require employees to work at home, such as tele-communications and IT companies. A Commission statement said the proposal would come on Tuesday. The work-from-home exemptions, which are currently drawn up and approved at sectoral level, have come under fire from trade unions, who argue that they are in conflict with the European social protection rules that seek to limit long hours for workers. The European Commission also wants to strengthen the rules on working time, including stipulating that workers can only be required to work overtime for a maximum of 11 hours a week and making sure that employers inform their workers when they take part in the national long working hours regime. The new rules will also look to ensure that employees are less exposed to the risk of digital and physical isolation as well as improving Europe's digital skills, through initiatives such as those introduced by the EU Social Network. The Commission also wants the policy to offer more training opportunities for people in the job market, including by supporting greater access to apprenticeship and second cycle training programs and increasing the number of courses in professional, technological and digital skills. The new rules are likely to be made as part of a broader "Green Paper" on how to turn Europe's digital transformation into a social and inclusive growth model. While the majority of Americans are still in the dark about the newest viral coronavirus, the UK government has announced that it is trying to make crucial biological research available to scientists who urgently need answers about the Covid-19 outbreak. The new initiative will enable researchers to access and download genetic, bioinformatics and other types of data from "crisis open access repositories" for coronavirus research. "This is the most important scientific research that will help us to understand the spread and evolution of coron
