In the demo we saw, an attacking United player had used his run-up to prepare for a flighted pass to the midfield, a fairly standard run-up for a player with a lot of good pace. However, the player makes a more exaggerated run-up for his pass which may seem slightly silly on first glance. But every time it happens it changes the way your opponent responds to the ball and forces him to re-think his decision making. Plus, it gives you something exciting to do with your run-up, up until now you've been in a position to execute a skill-less short pass to a teammate. The player made a long run in and then attempted to play a strike pass that ended up going over the goal line. However, players without pace become a bit reckless and don't always look back as carefully as the player did and therefore make the pass at a longer range. This means the ball arrives a little lower and the player has the opportunity to make a run on goal and attempt to place a finish on the wall. This gives you an alternative option to keep your momentum or perhaps even surprise a defender with a finish. You must think on your feet in FIFA 22. The player then made a move inside the penalty area and did a slight lay-off to a teammate who could potentially combine with his run in. The player then combined with his teammate and played a pass inside with a dummy run to a teammate who had covered his run, then immediately played a flying scissor kick pass, and so on and so forth. This kind of skillful gameplay was not possible in FIFA 21. Another interesting feature in FIFA 22 is the Focus system. When you're playing a match, the HUD will let you know when you can focus on different aspects of gameplay. For example, you can focus on your man marking to learn when your defender is attempting to pressure you, or focus on your passing or finishing when you're about to take a shot. This is a feature FIFA 21 lacked. Another new feature is the AI. Players make decisions based on their individual traits, such as speed, power, aggressiveness, stamina and so on. They will only make the decision you would normally make if they have their entire football repertoire at their disposal. For example, a player with the ability to dribble will only make the same decision on a pass as a player who is a bit slow. You can use the Focus system to learn when your opponents
